Dear Senator Collins and Senator Lieberman:

I am writing about Senator Collins's comments today that indicate she believes it is unusual for congressional committees to receive testimony from individuals who work in the White House.¹ As you consider your investigative plan for calling witnesses to discuss Hurricane Katrina preparedness and response, I wanted to make sure you are aware that there is ample precedent in which congressional committees obtained testimony from White House officials.

According to an October 6, 2004, report by the Congressional Research Service, precedent for congressional committees receiving testimony from presidential advisers dates back many years, involves a wide range of congressional committees, and includes top level White House positions.² I am attaching the CRS report, which contains a 14-page list of examples.³

In the House Committee on Government Reform alone, dozens of White House officials testified under oath during the Clinton Administration. The Committee deposed or took hearing

- John Podesta, Chief of Staff to the President
- Bruce Lindsey, Assistant to the President and Deputy Counsel to the President
- Harold Ickes, Assistant to the President and Deputy Chief of Staff
- Jack Quinn, Counsel to the President
- Charles Ruff, Counsel to the President
- Beth Nolan, Counsel to the President
- Bernard Nussbaum, Counsel to the President
- Roy Neel, Chief of Staff to the Vice President
- Margaret Williams, Chief of Staff to the First Lady and Assistant to the President
- Lanny Breuer, Special Counsel to the President
- Cheryl Mills, Deputy Counsel to the President
- Mark Lindsay, Assistant to the President for Management and Administration
- Douglas Sosnick, Assistant to the President and Director of Political Affairs
- John Emerson, Deputy Assistant to the President
- Bob Nash, Assistant to the President and Director of Presidential Personnel
- Marsha Scott, Deputy Director and Chief of Staff of Presidential Personnel

I hope this information is helpful.

Sincerely,

Henry A. Waxman
